HONGKONO, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28: 1892. THE FUTURE FOOD SUPPLY O

CHINA.

Within the past few years agricultural and other chemists have devoted much attention to investigations directed towards the action of the digestive organs upon certain kinds of food, and the conditions under which plant life especially that which yields the most nourishing food, can be produced in the largest quantities with the smallest expenditure of labour. Many articles upon these and cognate subjects bave appeared, both in Europe and Americs. To one of these (by Professor Atwater, in the Century Magazine) we wish to refer, as having an important bearing on the future of China, in which, may be assumed, we are all more or less interested. The Malthusiau theory has depressed thoughtful people for about a hundred years. If, as Malthus seemed to show, population increases in a geometrical ratio while food products increase only in an arithmetical ratio, it Transfer Books of The Union Insurance is evident that the question Is life worth living?" will not be permenently debatable. That our Angle-Saxon civilisation is incredibly and criminally wasteful of food is much better resissed by those of us who live among Chiuese than by people in the home lands. There is not only vast waste, particularly in a new and prodigal land, like the United States, but there is, especially in that country, a disproportionate consumption of fat and of sugar. Our tocalled sewage system is a standing disgrace. Refuse which would be invaluable if applied to the exhausted soil is, by laborious and most expensive methods, first made to pollute our waterways as much as possible and afterwards finds its filthy way into the ocean to be last there. Hence arise, as Victor Hugo long ago observed, two consequences -pestilence in the dwelling and hunger in the furrow. With all its unsavoury odours, in respect of economy of recuperative resources for soil, China is a whole millenium in advance of Europe or America. It is true we are now told that the precious nifrogen lost as we have just remarked is by Nature's marvellous housekeeping (which is Saxon for "economy") returned to the soil in ammonia brought by rain water distilled from the ocean, but that must be but a small part of the total thus recklessly squandered. Much of the remainder goes into marine vegetation which supports the life of fish, the possible quantities of which-as computed by both Professor Huxley and Professor Baird-surpasses belief. In this direction Nature is lavish beyond conception, and with proper management by man the supply is forever inexhaustible. The saving in the use of fish as food is direct in furnishing protein and in bringing back the precious nitrogen once lost. It is indirect in diminishing the use of meat, thus saving the waste of land. This furnishes an argument and a justification -were any needed-for almost any possible development of fish culture.

Within the past generation marketgardening has been revolutionised by the great market gardens in the neighbourhood of Paris. These seem to be gigantic hotbeds and forcing-houses. surrounded by lofty walls, protected from the weather, artificially warmed and so fortified as to defy climate. The effect of the system has been, so far as vegetable productions are concerned, to remove Paris two degrees further south. . Grapes and other fruits can be had at all sensons, and when all Paris has been supplied with vegetables the surplus is sent to London. What seems most strange (and not as clearly explained as one could desire) is the gardener's indifference to soil. His surprising results are obtained by means of mechanical appliances by a careful selection of plants and by the furnishing of the proper plant food. It is not so long ago since institutions in which agriculture is scientifically used to be contemptuously dubbed 'Cabbage Colleges.' That day, however, has now passed. It was an English chemist (Murray) who led the way in the use of phosphate of lime for the worthless soil of Lancoln Fleath, now a blooming garden. It was Liebig who brought the suggestion to public notice. Now fossil phosphates have been found all over the world, and the reclamation of much poor land is simply a question of transportation. Vast areas in every civilized country have declined in value because the soil has. High class FERTILIZER for Pot become used up. The richer the land the more it has been wasted. But now, thanks to a knowledge of applied chemistry, a process of recuperation has begun, and it is thought that the producing power of the earth can never again be so low as it is at present. Maithus greatly underrated this produring power of the soil. What used to be termed fertility may now be altogether ignored. The all-important factor is plant food, and soil itself may be dispensed with in toto. What the plant requires is carbon, oxygen, bydrogen and water, and all these come from the air; some of them through the soil, leaving only one or two per cent. of minerals to be drawn from the earth, Marvellous experiments, have shown that plants grown in ocean eand-previously heated to a red heat in order to destroy nutritive germs and supplied with minute doses of proper plant food, develope to twice the height of plants in fartile soil. Indeed, even the sand base may be dispensed with and nothing used but water. A German professor thus raised a single plant of dapanese buck-wheat hime feet high, bearing 796 ripe coeds, besides 108 imperfect ones. Most of the elements of plant food abound area in what are called barren soils. The

The task of the chemist is to economise these substances, and in accordance with the apparent law that a vital need is soon met by a discovery, both phos- The P. M. S. S. Ca.'s a. s. City of Peking, phates and potassium have been found in great quantities. One hundred and fifty pounds of the latter substance, costing $1.50, transformed an acre of land in Connecticut, so poor that its corn crop was not worth gathering, into soil that produced sixty bushels to the sore. With nitrogen the case is otherwise, for although there is an abundance of it in the air it has been supposed that plants can get it only from the soil. It is known, however, that leguminous plants. auch as beans and alfalfa (practically the same as what is called Shautung clover') take their nitrogen directly from the air. It thus appears that the future food supply will ultimately depend upon furnishing and transporting plant food. The ordinary rate of plant production is not necessarily the normal rate, which, indeed, may be a thousand-fold greater. The simplest elements are those most abundant in Nature, and all the old ways of estimating productivity by soil area and fertility are obsolete. The capacity of mankind to consume food is. after all limited, while the possibilities of food production are limitless. The very increase of population may so stantly to lower the price of human sustduance. War, famine and pestilence will no longer find their functions in keeping down a surplus population.

The bearings of this subject upon the future welfare of China are not recondite. Here we have the most numerous soil for a longer period than any other nation in history. When their numbers were relatively small it may have been comparatively easy to find support for them all, but that time passed ages | 27th inst. ago. All animal refuse is utilised; -but the same principle ought no doubt to be extended to the garbage of cities, which is now too often dumned into the nearest ditch or left where it happens to be thrown. Of the value of irrigation the Chinese were aware ages before any of our existing western nations came into being. Mr A. B. Johnson, Crown Solicitor, appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr J. Mr Johnson, in opening for the plaintiff said the suit was brought under Ordinance 12 of 1888. After stating the particulars of the claim he said these eleven men were tember 29th, at 4 pm. The following is brought down from Japan by the German mail steamer on 21st August, but the men were not landed till the following day. The first thing they did was to go to the Mosque, and from the Mosque they were sent to a restaurant in Cochrane Street, kept by a man named Hadii. As they had nothing to pay for their board and lodging, Hadji refused to put up the men, who then went to the Central Police Station. By orders of the police they were accommodated in restaurant in Cochrane Street for a sum of 25 cents a-head daily, and on 26th August they were declared vagrants. under the provisions of the Ordinance. After that steps were taken for their remowal from the Colony, as they spoke Turkish ed and respected resident of this port in the shipping companies having been communicated with it was finally decided to ship them as deck passengers for Port Said by the steamer Macduff, of which Mesers Dodwell, Carlill & Co. were the agents, the pasmage per man being $50.
